Heathenism in North Carolina.

[From the Wilmington (N. C.) Evening Post.]
About a mile above Brown Marsh—a station on the Carolina Central railway, and about 40 miles from this city, and about 200 yards to the left of the railroad track—can be seen the "Sanctuary of Tena." Just here we think it would not be out of place to give as much of a description of this strange being's history as our inquiries could elicit: Tena the "God" is a negro, apparently about fifty years of age, with a head of perfectly white hair. There is nothing about her person or features, with the exception of her hair, that would particularly strike one, and she does not differ from most colored persons in appearance. Tena, we learn, was originally from Wilmington, and a member of the Front-Street Methodist church, of this city, while under the pastoral charge of the Rev. Mr. Bobbitt. She was very demonstrative and noisy during the services in the church, and very often would run out and climb up a tree in front of the edifice, and there make the most horrible noise imaginable. Finally, on account of her noisy manner and repeatedly annoying the congregation, she was excommunicated. We failed to learn of her whereabouts from that time until the fall of 1863, when she located at Brown Marsh, where she has resided ever since. Upon her arrival there she immediately commenced to establish a "church" of her own among the colored people, but did not succeed very well until the close of the war, when she pushed her work with renewed vigor, until she has now about sixty persons in her band.

The "Prophetess" asserts that she can foresee and foretell any and everything that is to be, and makes the band worship and respect her as such. "The sanctuary" is a rude log-cabin containing one room, built in the commonest way imaginable, and in very many places the logs have fallen out, and by that means only can a circulation of air be obtained as there are no windows in the room. Nearing the "sanctuary" in front, from the railroad track, the first thing that strikes the eye of an observer is a couple of poles, about forty feet high and about eight feet apart, each with a man's shirt hanging on it; the shirts are made of common unbleached home-spun. On entering the enclosure one would be struck with the cleanliness of the yard; not a stick or even a pine straw is allowed to remain in the yard, as it would be considered an ill omen if perchance it should remain in the enclosure a half-hour unobserved. Immediately in front of the gate, and about half way between the fence and the "sanctuary," is a small pen about ten feet square, and in the middle of the pen is a block, the seat of the "God." This pen is termed by them the "singing-house." Here they all huddle up together, and dance and sing something that would remind one of an Indian war-song. Proceeding around the left corner of the "sanctuary," the next thing to observe will be a peculiarly-shaped clay-hole about half full of muddy clay-water. Our searching inquiries failed to elicit the technical name for the clay-hole. In this clay-hole each one of the band goes, makes a clay ball about two inches in diameter, and places it on the edge of the bank to dry and become hard. Following our guide around the house to the back door, we noticed four poles placed in the ground, forming a square, about three feet from the door. On each one of these poles there is a covering for the head, two bonnets and two hats. Around these poles the band dances on certain days (supposed to be holy days of the band). "Tena the God" has two seats of honor during prayers—one in the fire place and the other in the bed. She invariably sits in a Turkey during the services, and her followers kneel prostrate on the floor. They are known throughout the country as the "Tena Band." They have their day of atonement, and on this occasion the "God" offers up herself as a sacrifice for the sins of her followers. During this portion of the ceremonies for the day she sits in the fire-place and throws ashes over herself; then walks over, stepping on every one of her followers, who are lying on the ground, face down, to "wash out their sins." The band obey her, and perform their duty. The band obeys her scrupulously, every one of the dogmas of Tena's faith. It is as if it were a part of their religion to follow, sweeping the track and ties, and on every Wednesday, and carry the "God" to a small basket of provisions. Any who fail to comply with the requirements are punished. The "God" is very profane, and is held in fear and trembling by the colored people of the neighborhood, though, however, they do not fear that she will hurt them by doing them an injury by physical strength, but by "conjuring," putting mouth on them, or guffering them.

The band has been in operation for the past eight years, and by its earnings succeeded in building a shed in which to "worship." The authorities refused to let them use the shed for that purpose some twelve or eighteen months ago on account of the bad effect it had on the colored people, who were disposed to credit Tena's assertions.

CHAMPAGNE'S RISE.—It was during Napoleon's long period of prosperity that champagne first acquired its world-wide reputation. The conqueror did not himself care much for any wine but champagne; but the banquets of the time were enlivened by the popping of innumerable corks, and wherever the French eagles were carried there also appeared the glistening backs of a legion of pump bottles decked with silver foil or pink tulle, and yielding a sparkling fluid that bubbled and beaded in the tall glasses, and which the ladies of Europe at once took under their especial protection. It was in vain that some haters of innovation protested, like Alfred de Musset, that the first duty of wine was to be red, and that other and more daring dissidents refused the vinous title to the frothy interloper.

ATTEMPT TO STEAL A LOCOMOTIVE.—Some bold rascal took advantage of the engineer and fireman being at dinner the other day at Hopkinton, Ill., to detach a locomotive from a freight train and start for the Chicago exposition. The agent at the station ahead was telegraphed to open a switch and ditch the engine, but the thief met another train, compelling him to run some distance back, when he set the brake and escaped to the woods.
